During this 75-minute Work Session, Board Members were briefed on ACPS's MTSS for students. Emphasis was placed on desired state, current state and next steps. Participants received best-practice research concerning MTSS, information and data regarding ACPS current state, hear from practitioners regarding current experiences, and responded to next steps recommendations.

Dr. Acuff asked how this works past middle school – what happens in high school? – We probably have the most variability in high school. It's harder to track because high schools have different systems and different ways to support students. They all have different classes and intervention systems. Dr. Acuff added that this seems intensely focused on elementary and middle.

Ms. Osborne asked how do we determine who needs intervention when it comes to the older kids? – Right now, it's determined on course success, grades, standards of learning, and Reader Plus has a screener tool we use in middle schools.

Ms. Le asked if there was a number of range of students who need interventions to the number of interventionists? – I think it would be useful to have this number.

Mr. Paige asked if the intervention in high school was similar to the intervention in elementary and middle school? – It can be a little different among the three high schools.

Mr. Alcaro asked if we need more support in doing the data collection in the schools? He saw first hand the data collection just recently in the schools. And other teachers are getting pulled in because there aren't enough specialist or interventionist; over the course of the school year and the summer will there be some professional development so there will be more qualified staff?

The Board broke up into three groups with teachers; Christa Livermon, Denise Backman, LaNell Rachness, Tina Goode, and Beth White, and talked about how the process works at their individual schools.
